The Tenant Fees Act 2019 aims to stop landlords and letting agents in England from taking advantage of prospective tenants who pay holding deposits. It caps the maximum holding deposits that can be taken to one week's rent. A holding deposit, as the Act's sponsor Lord Bourne confirmed, creates "a binding conditional contract between landlord and tenant where both parties agree to enter into the tenancy, subject to the satisfactory fulfilment of all pre-tenancy checks.”This article outlines when a party can and cannot cancel a holding deposit agreement. It also clarifies when a landlord or their agent may retain a holding deposit, when they must refund it, and when they may be liable for damages for contract repudiation.

Civil law and common law systems are held to enforce promises differently: civil law, in principle, will enforce any promise, while common law will enforce only those with 'consideration'. In that respect, modern civil law supposedly differs from the Roman law from which it descended, where a promise was enforced depending on the type of contract the parties had made. This 2001 volume is concerned with the extent to which these characterizations are true, and how these and other differences affect the enforceability of promises. Beginning with a concise history of these distinctions, the volume then considers how twelve European legal systems would deal with fifteen concrete situations. Finally, a comparative section considers why legal systems enforce certain promises and not others, and what promises should be enforced. This is the second completed project of The Common Core of European Private Law launched at the University of Trento.
