This collection of papers from the Twentieth British Legal History Conference explores the relationship between substantive law and the way it actually worked. Instead of looking at what the courts said they were doing, it is concerned more with the reality of what was happening. The authors use a wide range of sources, from court records to merchants' diaries and lawyers' letters. The way in which the sources are used illustrates the possibilities of legal historical research which are opening up in the twenty-first century, as large databases and digitised images – from auction sites – make it a practical possibility to do work at a level which was almost unthinkable only a short time ago.

Also available as an e-book Traditionally, conflict of law rules designate only national substantive law as the applicable law. Many unifying and harmonizing substantive law instruments of both States and non-State organizations, however, are designed specifically for application to cross-border relationships. Achieving this objective is, generally, hindered by conflict of law rules. The requirements which non-national law needs to fulfil in order to be accepted as the law governing a cross-border relationship deserve clarification. Not only uniform law, such as the CISG and the envisaged European substantive law instrument for the law of obligations, but, particularly, instruments which are aimed at harmonizing substantive law, challenge the established systems of conflict of laws. In seeking a positive approach towards the application of a law other than national law various aspects need to be considered: (1) is the decision taken by a court or an arbitral tribunal; (2) what field of law (contract/delict/tort or family relationships) is involved; and (3) the objective or subjective (choice by the parties) designation of the applicable law.

The article analyses the fundamental premises of the differentiation between substantive and procedural rules in private international law and arbitration. The author opens the paper with the general differentiation between substantive and procedural rules and the reasons for such differentiation. The opening paragraphs are followed by a chapter dealing with the fundamental issues and premises of the differentiation between substantive and procedural rules in private international law. At the same time, the author endeavours to define a general approach applicable to such differentiation. Attention is devoted primarily to the specifics of such differentiation in arbitration and to a comparison with litigation. The general comments are followed by an analysis of the legal nature of limitation of actions and offset (set-off), the classification of which is significantly different in civil law countries (especially from the continental European approach) and in common law countries. The author also deals with the conflict-of-laws premises and the consequences of their nature, as they are perceived differently under the individual legal systems. Analysing the nature of these legal institutions and their conflict-of-laws implications helps to outline the general theoretical premises and the practical consequences of differentiation between the nature of substantive and procedural rules.

The Relation of Procedure to the Substantive Law

Psychology of justice research has demonstrated that individuals are concerned with both the process and the outcomes of a decision-making event. While the literature has demonstrated the importance of formal and informal aspects of procedural justice and the relevancy of moral values, the present study focuses on introducing a new form of justice: Substantive justice. Substantive justice focuses on how the legal system uses laws to constrain and direct human behavior, specifically focusing on the function and the structure of a law. The psychology of justice literature is missing the vital distinction between laws whose function is to create social opportunities versus threats and between laws structured concretely versus abstractly. In the present experiment, we found that participant evaluations of the fairness of the law, the outcome, and the decision-maker all varied depending on the function and structure of the law used as well as the outcome produced. Specifically, when considering adverse outcomes, individuals perceived laws whose function is to create liability (threats) as being fairer when structured as standards (abstract guidelines) rather than rules (concrete guidelines); however, the opposite is true when considering laws whose function is to create eligibility (opportunities). In juxtaposition, when receiving a favorable outcome, individuals perceived laws whose function is to create liability (threats) as being fairer when defined as rules (concrete guidelines) rather than standards (abstract guidelines).

This book focuses on the substantive law of the EU with regard to the free movement of goods, persons, services, and capital. An introductory chapter outlines the background to EU law in this sphere; the role of free trade theory, the development of economic integration until the present day, and the fundamental principles underpinning this development. The following sections then provide a detailed examination of the major categories - goods, persons, services and capital - and a concluding section deals with the legal issues raised by the ongoing process of harmonisation within the single market. The author makes judicious use of case studies to illustrate and develop central issues, diagrams and flowcharts to clarify the more complex areas of this sphere of EU law.
